SYNOPSIS

Over a decade ago, the Mexican government declared a war against organized crime, which ended up targeting civilians. An estimated 360,000 people have died since 2006. While searching for their disappeared family members, a group of mothers discovered mass graves in the small towns of Jojutla and Tetelcingo, in the state of Morelos. It became evident that the Mexican authorities were complicit in many of these disappearances. Lina, Angy and Edith and other family members of disappeared loved ones participated in the exhumation of more than 200 bodies. The documentary accompanies the women as they train in forensic science and dig up the bodies of the disappeared. Their investigation reveals a chilling reality, Mexican authorities were involved in the disappearances and surreptitiously buried the bodies in mass graves. This powerful documentary profiles the solidarity, courage and tenacity of these women.

DIRECTORS' STATEMENT

It's been more than ten years since Mexican authorities began destabilizing the country, fueling extreme violence under the guise of the "war on drugs". Since then, nothing has improved and many Mexicans have been killed or gone missing and it is absurd to think about the veracity of such a war.

It is very complicated to understand what is happening in Mexico. In the middle of such a horrific scenario we also began learning about the existence of mass graves. We heard they belong to "organized crime", that ambiguous figure that is difficult to grasp. The story shows that the Forensic Offices were also involved in disappearing people, clearly through negligence, omission, laziness and complicity. The authorities ensured to dissolve any trace or evidence of the organized crime by disappearing the bodies into these mass graves after they were killed.

This film implicates the Mexican authorities, the forensic offices and the Attorney General of Morelos, in the large scale burial of thousands of violently murdered people and show's the citizens themselves participating in the digging to find their relatives and the truth.

Why didn't the Mexican Authorities investigate those they buried? That is one of the questions the families of the victims are trying to answer. With every corpse unearthed, comes a complex story of corruption and impunity. This film shows the efforts of the families while the film team and I try to understand what really happened.
